I read it last week, and then tonight he sat and listened to the speech Recordings of some pieces, set to music. They are beautiful, vivid and you can listen to them here. Last week, we had a virtual roundtable on the state of the Canadian story at 49thshelf, where Doretta Lau mentioned Simpson's collection as the one that wiped it out. I already have ordered the book, because Marita Dachsel had mentioned Simpson read from it, and was already On my radar, Thomas King named Simpson the recipient of the RBC Taylor Award for Emerging Writers last year. These stories are not easy, even if they start more welcoming and familiar stories from childhood, but these stories have edges intended to vary readers by complacency. In most of them, there's a time when everything gets out of hand, and then I have to chase it. I appreciate the music and words that accompany these pieces, although the format suggests that these are stories to come back to, as you would a CD or a song. Not like a book, which we tend to put on the shelf once we have finished. How I am already having said, A i want to end with these works, which adhere to the oral tradition in this sense (which à is implicit in the address of many of these pieces, all the voices to which i have referred), that these are stories destined to be returned, modifying, as does the reader Â perspective, the details each time slightly different. Unique Perspective"In Decolonial Love Islands, Leanne Betasamosake Simpson is looking at herself and her lived experience. The short story collection spirals outward and upward. The more¹ you go on in the book, the more¹ you see the author in the context of the people around him. It looks like a bird coming down from the earth, turning up and up to see more and more of the picture.â Treasa Levasseur"Look at the land in which she lives, the people who are looking at her and her ancestors in a wide and circular view. Ã really a remarkable feat. It looks like a bird coming down from the earth, turning ever higher¹ to see more¹ than It sounds "the songs are impressionistic like the book. Speak the words of the text so that its voice is centered in these pieces. The instrumentation is different for each piece. Some of them have guitar with loop - there is a little loop of his voice and this beautiful piece is on his grandmother and Dufferin Grove Park of Toronto. So she moves on to another kingdom ... to have this very spiritual experience. Treasa Levasseur's comments have been modified for length and clarity, clarity.
